Resp	Response: New development is more acceptable to residents when there is little radical change to the existing character. While it is understood that some back garden development will be required to meet the requirement for new homes, planning policy should control this type of development. It should be plan-led and co-ordinated, not piecemeal and should specify dwelling size and type both to suit an area and to comply with policies for mixed communities. Random, speculative development affecting om District's gardens should be resisted.

	Response: Agree New development is more acceptable to residents when there is little radical change to the existing character. While it is understood that some back garden development will be required to meet the requirement for new homes, planning policy should control this type of development. It should be plan-led and co-ordinated, not piecemeal and should specify dwelling size and type both to suit an area and to comply with policies for mixed communities. We need to embrace the requirement of PPS 3 for local policies to create places, streets and spaces that meet the needs of people, are visually attractive, safe, accessible, functional, inclusive, have their own distinctive identity and maintain and improve local character. Imaginative design and policies are required to make higher housing densities acceptable and overcome people's fear of "town cramming". Such design-led approaches should ensme development is sympathetic to an area's character, fosters a sense of place and enables special features, including wildlife habitat and open space, to be retained and enhanced. See also comments under Theme 3, the Built Environment.

Resp	The HBF consider that density should be set on a site by site basis, responding to local character and the constraints on a site. The HBF therefore consider that whilst building at very high densities may demonstrate an efficient use of land, it is often not the most sustainable. The council's SHMA should guide the need and demand for the supply of high denisty housing, as this may not provide the solution in terms of housing supply which is sought by the authorities. Housing density should not be over prescriptive if specified in the core strategy. Policy documents are on the whole unresponsive to change. The HBF consider it would be unwist a density figure which could be in place for 15 years that is not responsive. Such issues should be considered on a site locational basis and should be market/need/demand led. Any proposed density requirements must also be fexible and allow for some development at lower densities to enable the provision of a full range of housing. Some low density development is essential and this should be adequately accounted for. This should be informed by an up to date SHMA and SHLAA. Furthermore density has important links with climate change which must be considered, the following is a quote from a recent report by the TCPA (Climate Change; Adaption by 2007) "Without an understanding of both mitigation and adaptation there is real danger that actions taken to address one could actually make the other worse. We can illustrate the looking again at the need for a range of densities of development: higher densities have been promoted as a way of improving the overall energy efficiency of the urban area. How density is to high this can exacerbate the urban heat island effect and increase the likelihood of urban flooding"

Hard and fast criteria providing distances to be achieved from services may prove counter productive. For this reason the criteria should include the broad issues outlined in 1/2006 and indicate that there will be a balancing exercise undertaken using the concept of reasonableness. Circular 1/2006 does indicate that criteria should be fair and realistic with some certainty than when they are met, and not necessarily all of them, that planning permission will be granted.
		Given the extent of Green Belt within the districts and the proposed urban extensions into the Green Belt then an exceptions policy should be developed to take into account the likely difficulties of finding achievable sites. In addition due consideration should be given to the position of the Dudmoor Gypsies whose situation while being recognised for many years has never been satisfactorily resolved. The simplest and most practicable rational solution would be to include them in a Green belt exception and grant them planning permission.
					due regard in the core strategy to the proportion of need ari- ning of delivery of the needed sites should be paid due regar
		As Gypsy and Traveller sites when owned or managed by a Registered Social Landlord are considered as affordable housing then local planning authorities may negotiate sec 106 agreements with developers to include Gypsy and Traveller sites in new developments, ensuriing that mixed communities are created at the outset (see CLG guidance- 'Local Authorities and Gypsies and Travellers: A Guide to responsibilities and Powers (May 2007). Hence such developments should form part of the provision for Gypsy and Traveller accommodation.
